

KELCE MIX review

By Ronin Tharp

The Kelce brothers have taken the internet by storm with their new cereal, the Kelce Mixes.

While there is a lot of hype around the new cereal, it did not exactly meet my expectations. It is supposed to be a mix of the three different cereals: Cinnamon Toast Crunch, Cocoa Puffs, and Lucky Charms. The cereal ends up just tasting like Cocoa Puffs with a different texture. Every once in a while, there was a marshmallow taste, but overall, their Cocoa Puffs were overpowering. The Cinnamon Toast Crunch is completely tasteless unless people purposely try only to get that in one bite.

While the Kelce mixes are already mixed, people would be better to make their own mixes. They can test out different mixes and make it so there is not a dominant flavor.

One mix that does not work at all is Cheerios, Frosted Flakes, and Cocoa Pebbles. With this mix there is less of a chocolate flavor, but the Cheerios and Frosted Flakes combine for a weird flavor. This is probably the worst mix of them all, including the Kelce mixes.

When making the mixes, it is important to think about what mixes will be good together. I recommend Cinnamon Toast Crunch, Frosted Flakes and Cheerios. These different cereals complement each other very well. Unlike the Kelce mixes, there is a taste of each of the different cereals in the mix.

One other great mix to try is Cookie Crisp, Frosted Flakes, and Cocoa Pebbles. The Cocoa Pebbles are much better in a mix than Cocoa Puffs because it does not give as much of a dominant taste. The Cookie Crisps mixed with the Frosted Flakes gives a unique taste, and I also got a taste of chocolate from the Cocoa Pebbles.

While the Kelce mixes may be decent, people would be better off to make their own mixes instead.

Students, staff, faculty, community challenged to brighten our world

With the current state of the world, there are constantly bad things happening. We see it on the news. We see it on our feeds. We hear about it from our friends and parents.

Whether in Greenwood or halfway across the world, there are constantly tragedies. So in a world where pain and grief can seem overwhelming, what can we do about it?

Often people feel disconnected from the problems the world faces because those situations may not be happening in their own communities. It is hard to care about cancer awareness until a classmate is diagnosed with cancer. It is hard to care about gun safety until a student is killed by one. It is hard to care about car accidents until a teacher is lost in one. It is hard to care about mental health until an officer in the community is lost to suicide. The reality of the world is that often problems as seen on the news feel distant and as if they will never affect us personally. Until they do.

As students, teachers, parents, and friends, how do we deal with life-altering moments? Grief is not a linear process. Some days, we may find it difficult to get out of bed, and on others, we can feel like any other day. Regardless, grief has the power to mold and shape the course of our lives.

There is no ultimate cure to the heartaches that the world faces. The best thing people can do is to embrace it and work through it with the help of family, friends, and professionals.

Also, we can find ways to honor people we have lost and fight against situations that cause that loss. A student is battling cancer, so his classmates raise $10,000 to help his family. A student is killed, so the community comes together to provide a safe place for healing for his classmates. A teacher is lost, so her students honor her by wearing her favorite color and showing her family the impact she had on their lives. A police officer commits suicide, so his family and friends organize a suicide prevention walk.

As we head into 2025, Timberlines wants our students, faculty, staff, and community to experience a new year and to rise above the hardships that face our world. It is up to us to forge the way and brighten our world.
